Life Before Becoming a Health Economist at Costello Medical

I studied at the University of Oxford for an undergraduate degree in Economics and Management. I then moved to London for a year to study for an MSc in International Health Policy (Health Economics) at LSE; during my Master's programme I completed a dissertation placement with the Department of Health. This confirmed my interest in working in Health Economics; however, I was worried that an entry-level position might be less technical than I was expecting. Thankfully, since starting at Costello Medical I have gained a vast amount of hands-on modelling experience and I am constantly learning new techniques.

Likes Best at Work

I enjoy the problem solving element that most of my modelling projects provide, and the fact that our clients really value our strategic and technical advice. I have had a great deal of contact with our clients which I find really satisfying, particularly when we receive feedback about the real-world application of our models after project completion.

Likes Best Outside of Work

Running, cricket, and watching films. I was new to Cambridge when I started my role at Costello Medical, but within a month of joining I was running a 10k race in the city with a team of fellow runners from the company, had become a member of the local independent cinema, and had found several great little bookshops and cafes to explore!
